Abstract/Excerpt

This article reviews works of contemporary female artists of Ethiopian origin active in the Israeli art field. I analyse the subjects in their work and argue these artists are presenting their attitudes towards the 'white gaze'. Though constantly subjected to it by the Israeli hegemony and the Western masculine discourse, they are notably decreasing their consideration of it. They broaden the restricted field of action that seems designated for them and alter its boundaries. Drawing on theorists of gender, postcolonial theory and theory of art, I demonstrate how these artists are promoting an agenda that reflects their lives as black women in Israel. Influenced by recent socio-political changes and a decline in representations of black women on TV and in visual arts, these artworks were increasingly exhibited in solo and group exhibitions.

Israel is a beautiful country, there's no denying that fact. With its diverse landscapes and scenery, rare beauty is incredibly varied, and whilst traveling in Israel you are almost certain to, very often, gasp in beautiful places in Israel which you might like to include when deciding what to do in Israel. Hula Valley is different to the sandy desert that many people consider Israel to be covered by, but Israel has people from all over the world in this country, all mixed into one place. This is also the reason why it is so beautiful. However, having said so, to be "precisely" accurate, Israel is not a country for everyone. It is a country for people of many different nationalities - one should google "number of times Israelis won Miss Universe contests" to get a better idea. The questioner asks "How can Israeli women be so beautiful?" the answer is simply "Because you consider them beautiful."
