Recent papers in Relationship between social institutions and social stratification. Papers. People. The analysis of the various contemporary human societies leads to realize how coexist on the terrestrial globe, albeit in different geographical areas, some societies similar to those of other living species, that the most reliable evolutionary theories they have cataloged as within reach of the pre-human species, coexist with other societies, very different, at exclusive prerogative of the human species. Therefore and, unfortunately, the bi-univocal link between biological evolution and social evolution, as proposed by sociobiology, is totally unfounded. Leadership skills are, in many contexts—the workplace, schools and classrooms, politics, volunteer organizations, and even within families—fairly recognizable. That kind of dynamic between employee and manager is similar to what we encourage couples to create in their own relationships—keeping a positive perspective, validating each other's positions despite disagreement, and being intentionally respectful, even during difficult times. This isn't to say that emotional intelligence is enough to get you to that leadership position in your job—you will still need the professional knowledge and experience—but it means that if you take a leadership role and have a higher degree of emotional intelligence, you will likely be more effective and more successful.
