In Ecstatic Nation: Confidence, Crisis, and Compromise, 1848-1877, her splendid new history of the Civil War period, Brenda Wineapple takes us on a different ride. Think the Monaco Grand Prix: zigzagging, sometimes precipitous, with hairpin turns that slow you to a crawl followed by straightaways where you reach 200. Lincoln is there, of course, along with all the other major players, but the usual dichotomies are replaced by a kaleidoscope of outsize personalities, conflicting visions and unforeseen events. In other words, Wineapple gives us history as it feels in real time: full of plans that Ecstatic Nation is a brilliant portrait of American society in the mid-nineteenth century. . . .

In Ecstatic Nation, Wineapple offers a beautifully written and skillfully woven narrative that anyone interested in American history should enjoy. (BookPage). A remarkable, mesmerizing book. . . . The book spans the entire period from 1848 to 1877, when the Civil War gestated to its execution and catastrophically botched aftermath, the Reconstruction that resulted in Jim Crow. It was an exuberant time, the US was beginning to feel its oats with new prosperity and confidence. Nonetheless, for the next century, the old elite in the South was permitted to do as it had wished. The slaves might have gotten their freedom, but they remained under the most brutal racist oppression.
