

↓ index.pdf

The role of government and social capital in disaster management has a significant effect on economic recovery. The government needs to conduct a more comprehensive study in determining strategies and policies in the field of disaster management and increasing mutual trust between communities and the government. during emergency response and post-disaster in Bali Province. If it is associated with disaster management, the indicator of the role of local government can refer to indicators of the role of the government in developing SMEs, namely as facilitators, regulators and catalysts (Diva, 2009). Coleman (1999) states that social capital is an obligation and expectation, channels of information and social norms. • Stage three is development coordination, characterized by a government increasingly taking the driver's seat in policy and implementation, combined with effective mechanisms for management of government resources – aid and revenue – and engagement between the government and the community of development partners. It is how each country adopts the generic model that is of interest, with the understanding that these approaches are very country- and context-specific, and hence not always transferable. This also means that the effectiveness of the coordination mechanisms adopted changes over time and is subject to “ups and downs”, depending on changes affecting key actors or the external or internal policy environment. Recent papers in Disaster Risk Reduction and Management. Papers. People. Local governments nationwide have been adopting a variety of sustainability practices in the absence of strong federal guidance. The collection of these practices, which differ in design, forms the local government's sustainability more. Local governments nationwide have been adopting a variety of sustainability practices in the absence of strong federal guidance. The case to be examined is disaster management cooperation in the Southeast Asian region, although there are now more. This paper demonstrates how constructivism is applicable to the rationale for the growing trend in international relations.